Q: C# Property of type void[] While defining a property of type void[], is the void[]'s default constructor called or not? My question arises from having read about reflection in both C# books. It seems to me that in a simple instance of a class with a property of type void[] the constructor will always be called. However, I am not sure how to find out if this is true.

A: The default constructor is called when you declare the property without an initializer, like so: `private void[] SomeProperty { get; set; }` You have to initialise it in your setter (or initialise it in the constructor).

Kedar, 23, didn't take any ball contact and played just two snaps. His biggest play of the evening came on a 4th and 2 conversion attempt in the red zone with just :05 left in the game. Kedar, who played in just three games as a rookie, spent the second half on the sideline after being carted off the field and took an MRI exam, according to Aaron Wilson of the Baltimore Sun. "I couldn't really tell you," he said. "It was just little stuff. I just fell back on the ground and I couldn't really feel my foot. When I woke up, they told me I just had to rest, so I took a little nap. I'm going to be sore tomorrow." Not much is known on the nature of the injury, but the timing certainly makes it a concern. The Ravens now have no quarterbacks on their 53-man roster, so Kedar will need to wait until the team adds another signal-caller before seeing game action again. In the meantime, rookie free agent signee David Njoku will get the opportunity to at least get some work in.

Q: Number of seconds between two date times to set action on a timer I am creating a program to record the time a user presses the start button on a software application. This will be used to compare the time they started the application to the time when the application shuts down. The programming is in a VS2010 WinForms project and uses Visual Studio 2010
