MUMBAI, India — Ananya and Krish are about to leave for their dream wedding. Their families have been overjoyed to see them getting married, and they plan to celebrate with the mother of the bride, and the father of the groom, taking them to a fancy restaurant and buying them expensive gifts. The two friends from east India's Odisha state have been in their final semester of their master's program at a top American university, and they have been going to the same yoga classes together, eating the same vegetarian food, and going for bike rides along the quiet shoreline of their neighborhood. But until now, neither family has ever met the other. "Krish and I are really excited to have our parents meet for the first time," says Ananya. "We're both very religious and traditionally, when couples are married, there has to be a dowry. We're not expecting anything to be given to us, but we just want the support and blessing of our families, and their love and acceptance, so that we can get married and start our lives together." This family meeting, however, has come at the cost of their studies. The students have their differences — Ananya is a Hindu, Krish a Muslim — but both believe in equality and in love for all, and hope to make this meeting a celebration of that. "I really hope they meet in a good way, because my family and Krish's family will be very similar — in terms of religion, ethnicity, culture and so on," says Ananya. "I hope they meet and become friends. I think it would be great if they came to our wedding as our guests, and everyone can have a good time." Krish adds, "If we had the money, we would want to throw a party for them. We would want to invite the parents of both of us, because they are both nice people and we are looking forward to having a good time with them. It's a shame we are poor, but we just want to have a good time and enjoy being together. That's why we decided to get married, so that we can have a good time and celebrate with our parents, and their parents." 'If we had the money, we would want to throw a party for them. We would want to invite the parents of both of us, because they are both nice people and we are looking forward to having a good time with them.'

Topic Cover : - 2 states, full movie, 2 states, full movie, cast, 2 states, full movie starring, 2 states... 2 state is a very interesting and unusual project that is unlike any other movie I have ever seen. I thought it would be an American film, but it turned out to be Mexican. Nevertheless, this does not interfere at all, because the film turned out to be very interesting and even exciting. fffad4f19a
