Yes, the digital certificates do expire, however they are generated on an annual basis, so you can't just generate a certificate now and wait a year. They expire either when the certificate expires or when a replacement certificate is generated. Passwords are encrypted with a bcrypt hash using a randomized salt. If you know what the hash of the hash of the password is, you can make a guess at the plain text password, but you won't get the exact plain text password (given enough tries, your guess will become one of the 6,057 possible possibilities). Encryption using this method is done to make password cracking more difficult. A brute force attack only needs to try 3 times the number of possible passwords (in this case, 60,057 passwords), while a rainbow table would need to try 10 times the number of possible passwords (in this case, 620,057 passwords). We decided to generate a certificate for GFI LanGuard Network Security Scanner because we had already generated a certificate for the latest version of Kaspersky Security Network, and we needed to be sure that the same certificate would be used for both. There is currently no way for us to decrypt the
