To estimate the effect of cervical cancer screening (Pap smear tests) on use of health services by women. Population-based cross-sectional survey. Queensland, Australia. Four thousand women aged 25-64 years who were participants in a telephone survey in 1996. The survey included questions on history of cervical cancer screening and use of health services by women who had been screened. On average, women had been screened 5.4 years earlier (median 3.8 years) and had been screened more frequently than before (median: once every 3 years). A total of 88% of women with a previous Pap test had been screened within the last 2 years. The major reasons for not being screened in the preceding 2 years were: not being offered screening (33%), not knowing about screening (26%), and lack of a doctor's recommendation (17%). The average number of visits to medical practitioners in the year before the survey was 12.8 per year (range: 0-30). A total of 5% of women had been treated for breast cancer, 3% for bowel cancer, 5% for a sexually transmitted disease and 18% for mental illness or abuse. Women with a Pap test in the preceding 3 years were more likely to have had a medical practitioner visit (p
