Polymorphonuclear neutrophils (PMN) are the most abundant white blood cells in human blood and have an important role in the host defense mechanism against microorganisms and tissue injury. Though PMN are a major contributor of the early host defense, their effective utilization as therapeutics is often complicated by their ability to transmigrate through vessel walls and release their toxic effects beyond the site of tissue injury. Moreover, the direct effects of PMN on endothelial cells can result in increased vascular permeability and platelet adhesion. The effect of PMN on endothelial cells is mediated through the release of toxic mediators including oxygen radicals (ROS), proteases, and a lipid mediator (i.e. leukotriene B4
