In Goblet of Fire, when Harry asks Dumbledore why he killed Grindelwald, he says, If he had to kill him to save the world... In one of the past life Harry/Gellert Grindelwald questionnaires he lists this as his reason for not being ready to die (because he didn't want to be with Rita Skeeter when she found out). Now, I can see how it's a valid argument, but I don't see how Dumbledore was in the right to say "if" (or "even if") the reason was because Harry said he couldn't do it? Is there a valid reason for that? A: Dumbledore is referring to the fact that Harry never killed Grindelwald - he had one chance to do it, and he refused. "But I didn't kill him,' Harry protested. 'I knew where he was and I never saw him, and Dumbledore had me watching over him and he never made a move against me. He had his own plan. He didn't want me to hurt him.'" - Harry Potter and the Goblet of Fire, Chapter 33 (The Death Eaters) Dumbledore is saying that even if Harry had killed Grindelwald, Dumbledore would still have had a plan. He can't let Harry know that, because then he'd know that Dumbledore had the answer, and Dumbledore knows that Harry has seen it. I believe that Dumbledore wouldn't have been honest with Harry about the reason for the circumstances in which he lived, in case Harry was to learn anything else that could be used against him. A: "If" is just Dumbledore's way of saying " 4bc0debe42
