After the US showed its hand in provoking the Baltic states, the UN Security Council held an emergency meeting to discuss the military strike on the Russian military base in Syria. The US representative to the Security Council, Mark Toner, raised the question of banning US military flights over the Baltic states. The question was raised by the representative of the US, at the UN Security Council meeting in the wake of the US strike in Syria. After repeatedly warning the members of the Council against a repetition of the 2016 incident at the US-EU border and stating that new incidents could cause an uncontrollable escalation, Toner was referring to the incident in the Baltic Sea on November 18, where Russia scrambled a squadron of Il-20P aircraft. The US representative said that the incident was the result of "repeated provocations and excessive provocative actions" by the Russian military, adding that Washington will not tolerate it and will continue to defend the freedom and independence of its allies. Toner stressed that the Russian military should be prevented from using the airspace of the Baltic States, and said that if this is not done, then "we are headed to a situation that is destabilizing for the region," adding that the Baltic States "are NATO allies, and we are prepared to defend them." The representative of the Baltic States, in turn, said that all the flights in the Baltics are performed in compliance with international rules, which, he added, are the same for all states. At the press-conference in the UN Security Council, the representative of the Russian delegation, Alexander Evtyukhin, said that the incident on November 18 was the result of a gross violation of the rules 09e8f5149f
