is for sure. Nationalism and a programme of nationalism are at the heart of Brexit. The left should be fighting for a different system in which we are all citizens of the world.

All our conversations about nationalism, empire and race need to be based on that standpoint. The poison of nationalism is that it can generate a narrative that justifies everything that is wrong. The danger is that it becomes a way to dehumanise not just different groups but also ourselves. This has already started. We don't have the answers to the problems of globalisation. But at the moment there seems a reaction to the loss of identity and the retreat from it. There are psychological and economic reasons for this. In an age when jobs are insecure, you need an identity. You need someone to look up to and an enemy to fight against. It is why in the Trump years the "alt-right" came into being. The alt-right is a racist movement. I don't want them in my movement, but they exist. They are anti-immigrant. That means Muslims and migrants. And in the UK we will see this in the language we use. In the speech of the leader of the Brexit Party, Nigel Farage, there were clear implications of a hyper-nationalism. It is an exultant patriotism. It is why people voted for Brexit. This is delusional. What we need is a globalisation that works for all, with the full support of the government. People voted for Brexit because they can't work with the EU because
