That is, unless you have an optical character recognition app to assist you. That's what "Ocr Text Recognizer" is about. A simple app that helps you out in this regard. It's an extremely simple app, with no more than 3 sections ("Settings", "Input", and "Output"). You can either scan the text, or open an image file to scan it. There are many text recognition apps in the store, but this one makes the most sense to use. Why? That's because this app is not "smart". You have to actually choose and position the font the app should use. If you don't do this, then you are left with the options of "default" or the "selected" font. Even if you are familiar with the kind of font the app might use, choosing it will have the "Ocr Text Recognizer" attempt to decipher your handwriting. If the app works, then you will see a progress bar. As long as the text is readable, there is no problem with the font.
