The analysis of microscopic tissue sections is of paramount importance for the detection and characterization of abnormalities in tissue samples. Such abnormalities could include dysplasias, adenomas, pre-malignant or malignant lesions. One of the most widely used methods of analysis of tissue samples is the microscopic detection of various abnormal cellular structures. Such abnormal structures could include cellular dysplasias, alterations in cell or nuclear size or morphology, hyperchromatic nuclei, megalocytosis, mitoses or an altered cytoarchitecture. Staging of various types of cancer is used to indicate the degree of progress of a tumor, the metastatic capability of a tumor, or the responsiveness of a tumor to treatment. The methods of staging and grading tumors include histological analysis of tissue sections. Such histological analysis consists of sectioning portions of the tissue in thin, stained microscopic tissue sections, and manually counting the number of abnormalities in each section using a microscope. Unfortunately, this method is tedious, time consuming and not well suited for analyzing large numbers of tumor sections. Furthermore, the accuracy of such analysis can vary depending on the skill of the individual performing the analysis. In addition, the accuracy of this type of analysis can depend on the attentiveness of the observer. Consequently, it is desirable to provide a method and apparatus for analyzing tissue sections which avoids the disadvantages associated with the current methods. FILED
