Paying for the policies and practices that keep us safe is the most complex allocation of resources our society faces, requiring both administrative and business-level attention. While overall security spending has been rising, the relative rise in spending on computer security has been far slower. Recently, however, rising ransomware attacks have the attention of industry stakeholders and U.S. policymakers alike. It is important for federal agencies to understand the role of the private sector and how it can be engaged to address its business challenges. This white paper explores the activities that have created a broader policy framework for cybersecurity, and a series of recommendations for enhancing and managing the relationship between federal cybersecurity and the private sector. Share The United States is the world's technological leader, but we also face new, complex cybersecurity issues in a rapidly changing world. An increased reliance on technology has created new risks but also new opportunities for improving the security of our systems and defending against cyberattacks. U.S. companies and researchers are developing better ways to fight cybercriminals, but these strategies are facing challenges, from limited budgets to the need to navigate a patchwork of federal and state regulations. The National Institute of Standards and Technology (NIST), one of the Department of Commerce's seven science agencies, is a federally funded research and development center. NIST's mission is to promote U.S. innovation and industrial competitiveness by advancing measurement science, standards, and technology in ways that enhance economic security and improve our daily lives. In vivo carbon-13 solid-state NMR spectroscopy for imaging glycosaminoglycan distribution in human cartilage. The application of solid-state <sup>13</sup>C NMR spectroscopy to imaging of cartilage is demonstrated. In addition to providing the means to detect unlabeled glycosaminoglycans, <sup>13</sup>C-labeled glycosaminoglycans can be detected by cross-polarization. The distribution of cross-polarization of the three major cartilage glycosaminoglycans was measured in the interterritorial matrix of human articular cartilage and in sheep menisci. Cross-p
