Tuberculin-like reaction on Bacillus Calmette-Guérin immunization in patients with pulmonary tuberculosis. Bacillus Calmette-Guérin (BCG) is used to treat disseminated tuberculosis (TB) in children. It also protects against primary TB in adults. In healthy children, BCG produces a local tuberculin-like reaction (TLR) that is limited in size and time. A substantial number of adults have been shown to have TLRs to BCG, including some who have never had TB. The number of TLRs in adults is correlated with childhood exposure to TB. One can hypothesize that the TLR to BCG can be produced by a BCG-induced cell-mediated immune response (CMI) with T lymphocyte involvement. In a prospective longitudinal study we examined TLR in a cohort of HIV-negative adults with primary pulmonary TB before treatment. TLR was identified as a reactional parameter, and this study examined whether BCG can produce a TLR. One hundred eight patients received BCG to previously untreated pulmonary TB. TLR was elicited from 56% of the patients. Forty-two percent had a mixed TLR reaction (local induration of >5 mm and erythema), and 26% had a single induration of >5 mm. The median time for TLR to develop was 7 days. TLRs to BCG were seen in 13 of 15 (87%) of the patients who were exposed to childhood TB and in 41 of 42 (95%) of the patients who were not exposed to childhood TB. Ten of these subjects had previous TB infection. The study showed that the majority of patients with primary pulmonary TB have a TLR to BCG. It also confirmed that BCG can produce a TLR in subjects who have never had pulmonary TB and showed that the TLR can be elicited even in adults exposed to childhood TB. The data do not rule out the possibility of a TLR to mycobacterial antigens in adults. [The role of renal arteriography in the diagnosis of renal tumors. Apropos of 100 cases].
