app that addresses the accessibility needs of a great many. Ceiling fan A ceiling fan, also called a "pendant fan" or "pendant light", is a ceiling-mounted, rotating fan that is typically used to provide gentle movement to the air as it circulates through a room. The motors for ceiling fans use ball bearings to provide smoother rotation. An advantage of a ceiling fan over a window fan is the ability to heat an entire room with a single ceiling fan. In Japan, as of April 2016, the number of homes with ceiling fans is projected to reach 120 million. History Fans were originally used in ancient China to cool rooms. The ancient Romans used ceiling fans to heat an entire room. Modern ceiling fans were originally mounted in public spaces, such as theaters, restaurants, fountains, and so on. The first ceiling fan was invented in Italy in 1878. Modern ceiling fans began appearing in homes after World War II and usually have the advantage of being quieter than window fans. Fans were originally attached to the ceiling or the beam of a house, however, today almost all ceiling fans are installed using a light fixture and a ceiling bracket. Ceiling fans are available in a variety of sizes (both circular and octagonal); fans typically range in size from. They may come with a single fan or multiple fans, such as a pair. Types Ceiling fans may be mounted directly into the ceiling (up to about 8 feet) using a ceiling-mounted downrod or directly to a beam. Manufacturers may provide fan mounting kits. In most climates, heat rises and cools fastest in a square space, so ceiling fans tend to be more effective in the cooler months when heat rises and in the hotter months when heat rises less quickly. The perceived cooling effect on the body depends on the fans speed, the amount of humidity, and the temperature of the fan blades. Major manufacturers include: See also Smoke alarm
