Here's a detailed look at the new gameplay feature: Here's how it works: Move the ball with your feet, and let the game decide what to do with it. Whether it's dribbling a pass to a teammate, shooting from distance, or tackling an opposing player, the game delivers the right dribble, shot, pass, or block. Here's a breakdown of what is happening to the ball as you play the game (with comparisons to real-world play): With its new "HyperMotion" technology, FIFA 22 introduces a new form of control based on player movements in real life. Players use their real-life skill levels to make the right decisions on the ball. With Real Player Motion Technology, every on-ball interaction in the game looks and plays true to life. Every dribble, pass, shoot, and tackle is powered by data from motions we have recorded from 22 live-action football players, including Premier League stars. The inputs into FIFA 22 are a blend of data from motion capture and from motion tracking sensors located in FIFA 22's players. What's different is that players use the ball much like they do in real life, with their movements governed by controlled natural movements and bodily functions such as muscle movement. For example, players will respond to a new move with a new skill level that is determined by how they move the ball in their actual body movements. While it was previously difficult for the players to make the right decisions on the ball on a small scale, for example when dribbling a pass, in FIFA 22 players will be able to react to the way they move in the game and the ball. The player's skill level governs every interaction with the ball. That means a player will react to an offensive move like an opponent will, if the player has the skill to do so. How does that work in practice? You'll notice that every player controls the ball differently according to their own natural movements, and whether they are strong or weak. For example, a simple pass can be a simple short pass or a long pass. And a player can change a touch to a pass, but a pass can be changed to a shoot. FIFA 22's enhanced dribbling system also allows players to make controlled movements. The most basic dribble in a game is the crossover dribble.
