Click Download Configuration.Responses of community insect species to support of field-grown alternative host plants and measure of attractant efficacy. Large-scale conservation of threatened vertebrate species, particularly of birds, is often contingent upon provision of suitable feeding resources to support the production of hatchlings. However, in many habitats, the majority of avian species occur as insectivores which may be severely threatened by herbivore control programs, such as those intended to protect endangered species. Feeding by these foraging insectivores may be supported via predation of alternative vertebrate prey. This study sought to assess the responses of the threatened, specialist insectivore, Varanus leucogaster, to a range of native and exotic host plants and seeds compared with those of the invertebrate detritivore, Opalina vernalis, feeding upon wheat seed. Feeding trials were performed using a randomized complete block design with each block containing 24 one-ounce paper cups, each containing a single species of host plant in a factorial 2 × 6 array: legume (Acacia aneura, Caesalpinia crista, Acacia leucophloea, A
