With Guides visible, use the slider to control the Guides distance from your image. With Guides hidden, click the button to reveal it or click again to hide it. * Use the Add New Layer button to add any new layers you need to work on in the same image. * Use the Layer menu to make any changes to the Layers panel. * Use the Selection tool to select the image part you want to work on. * You can duplicate a layer (Ctrl+click/⌘-click) to create a second layer. * Use the Layers palette to view or hide the layers. You can also drag one or more layers from the Layers panel and drop them on the palette to remove them. * To apply a default color to a layer, right-click the layer and choose the color from the Sublayer menu. * Add Layer Masks to create a new layer that's semitransparent over another layer. (See the "Using layer masks" sidebar, later in this chapter, for details.) * To use the Grid in Photoshop, open the Create Guides dialog box by choosing Edit Create Guides. Figure 5-2. Since the rise of Donald Trump, reggae music has been hotly in demand. Fans have rushed to download and stream songs by reggae artists, hoping that the old Jamaican rhythm will somehow penetrate the president's America. Before that, singer Aimee Mann released the soundtrack for "The Gift," a comedy starring Seth Rogen and Katherine Heigl, and Cuban-American rapper Arturo Sandoval made a reggae Christmas album called "Do It Like This (Too Artistic to Be Familiar)" and R. Kelly, ever the connoisseur, has shown a gift for dub and grime. His albums have come and gone, but his influence has persisted. His prominent role at the Kennedy Center Honors in 2011 boosted his stature and increased his appeal. Now, however, he's in the news for being outed by two women as a serial sexual abuser. Kelly was caught allegedly kissing and grabbing women's rear ends in a widely circulated video from 2003, and now a second woman is accusing him of similar behavior. Kelly's attorney, Lin Wood, says the charges are false. "Kellie has met many of the people making these false allegations, heard their stories, and believes their motive is to find financial gain. These stories are simply not true." Kelly has not responded publicly, but he has released a statement via his attorney. "The recording, which was taken without my knowledge, has been misconstrued and used by some to tarnish my name and reputation. I am deeply hurt by these false allegations. I have been damaged and have lost business as a result of my name being dragged through the mud," he said. "I can only hope that my family, loved ones and fans can find it in their hearts to know that this is not true. I have never been guilty of this sort of behavior and I am not guilty today." Kelly's comments are consistent with what he's said about this in the past, and there's no reason to think he will backtrack. The women who've been talking to the press have all been black, a fact that has intensified Kelly's problematic legacy. At this point, it's difficult to see him getting a second chance to move on. Kelly is still beloved among black fans. He's rapped about the funk and known to be a champion of Miami hip-hop. He's also made an effort to reach out to black artists and supported the Obama administration's "Chance the Rapper

Two months after a magnitude 7.7 earthquake struck Nepal, that country's water system has seen only a tiny fraction of the aid it desperately needs, according to new figures. The figures, released by the UN, show that the amount of clean water delivered to remote villages and mountain villages has fallen to just nine per cent of the supplies needed. Aid workers and activists have warned that without sustainable supplies, Nepal's two million people will face the consequences – from epidemics and deaths to further political violence and increased migration. In Kathmandu, many people said the government was indifferent to the needs of the country's rural poor. They said there was little sign of the will to rebuild the economy, which has been badly damaged by the earthquake. "They are making billions for themselves out of the crisis but where is the help for the people," said Labar Anshu Kanta Adhikari, president of Nepal's Small Farmers Advocacy Network. The Nepalese government received $912million from international donors to rebuild earthquake-damaged schools and hospitals in the capital Kathmandu, but the full cost of rebuilding the country's water supply systems is more than $1.6billion. Food and water supplies were especially acute after the earthquake, as it struck on April 25, with aid organisations warning of a life-threatening water crisis. The United Nations said on Wednesday that only 50 per cent of bottled water had arrived in the capital, and that it was expecting a full delivery by the end of June. Aid workers and activists said the city's poor would have been further encumbered by water shortages and disease if the government's response had been more effective. "Many of the seriously injured have been unable to get medical treatment and water and food has been running short," said Andrea Mlasic, a doctor who was working in Nepal when the earthquake struck. "People are dying in Nepal." Most aid agencies and ordinary people have stressed the need to fix the country's decrepit water systems. "Water deliveries is essential for survival," said one government employee in Kathmandu. "If children can't get water they die." Aspergillus, a fungus that attacks the lungs of people with weak immune systems, had killed 14 out of 20 children who were brought to hospital in Kathmandu's most dangerous slum,
