Supporting patients with cancer: a role for nurses to help them with end-of-life care decisions. The objective of this study was to explore nurses' use of their nursing practice competence and their perceived competence in supporting patients with terminal cancer regarding decisions regarding end-of-life care. The study used a qualitative design and was based on 17 nurses and caregivers in four inpatient cancer wards at a university hospital in Sweden. Data were collected via interviews and analysed using thematic analysis. Nurses supported patients in making decisions regarding end-of-life care; however, they experienced barriers to working in this regard. Lack of knowledge, lack of competence and/or lack of support was identified as factors. Nurses in the study had many tasks that were not directly related to supporting patients in end-of-life decisions and expressed a need for guidance and support in this area. To enhance the use of competence in decision-making support, information for nurses on best practice should be provided and support should be offered regarding the use of competence in decision-making support.
